Building a new Kentucky home by saving lives from addiction

FRANKFORT, Ky. (Dec. 19, 2024) – Gov. Andy Beshear announced today that Floyd, Knott and Lawrence counties are now certified as Recovery Ready Communities, bringing the total number of certified counties to 21. Counties are recognized for having established services for residents who are seeking help for drug or alcohol addiction in three different categories – prevention, treatment and recovery support.

“I’m grateful to community leaders in Floyd, Knott and Lawrence counties for helping us make our new Kentucky home a place where people can find the hope and support they need to overcome addiction. Your efforts are truly saving lives,” said Gov. Beshear. “If you are ready to start your recovery journey, Team Kentucky is here to support you every step of the way.”

This announcement follows the Governor’s recent news that Kentucky saw a 9.8% decrease in drug overdose deaths in 2023, the commonwealth’s second consecutive annual decrease.

“Today’s three newly certified counties, Floyd, Knott and Lawrence counties, are to be commended for their focus on helping our most vulnerable population – our children,” said Pam Darnall, chair of the Recovery Ready Communities Advisory Council. “By ensuring that Kentucky’s youth have access to addiction treatment, peer support specialists, mental health treatment and second chance employment, we are creating a successful future for our next generation and saving future families from pain and loss.”

The certification of Floyd, Knott and Lawrence counties will allow Kentuckians to make positive changes in their lives while filling much-needed jobs and contributing to the commonwealth’s record-breaking economic growth.

Floyd County has been designated as a Recovery Ready Community and is ready to provide treatment services to roughly 34,423 Kentuckians through their Mountain Comprehensive Care Center, which operates a Quick Response Team focused on harm reduction, education, mental health and addiction treatment for overdose victims and their families. The county also operates a youth drop-in addiction center for ages 16 to 25 as well as the community’s only youth emergency homeless shelter. Floyd County is building a new Kentucky home where addiction is no longer destroying families through its “Reverse the Cycle” program, which places peer support specialists inside the county’s emergency departments. Additionally, the Floyd County Court system has expanded to include District and Circuit Drug Treatment Court, Veterans’ Drug Treatment Court and Mental Health Court, as well as access to the Eastern Kentucky Concentrated Employment Program, which helps individuals in recovery obtain meaningful employment.

“The recognition of Floyd County as a Recovery Ready Community is a testament to the cooperation and commitment of criminal justice officials and community partners to make Floyd County a better place to live and work,” said District Court Judge Tyler Green.

“By achieving a Recovery Ready Community certification, Floyd County signals its commitment to support those with substance use disorders holistically, improving lives and fostering a healthier, more supportive environment,” said Floyd County Public Health Director Martha Ellis. “Recovery Ready Certification ensures that systems are in place in Floyd County to reduce relapse rates, reduce overdose rates and promote mental health support all while promoting improved public health outcomes, community awareness and enhancing economic benefits.”

Knott County has been certified for its multiple prevention efforts focused on assisting high-risk individuals, families and neighborhoods. The county, which services more than 13,000 Kentuckians, operates a drop-in youth addiction center for ages 14 to 25, connects patients through the hospital system with addiction treatment prior to discharge and operates a full-service harm reduction outreach program, . Beacons of Hope, a rehabilitation center in Hazard, is also present in the county, providing both residential and outpatient addiction recovery services to the people of Knott County.

“Knott County’s journey to becoming a Recovery Ready Community is a testament to the resilience, strength and unity of its people,” said Greg Burke, executive director of Beacons of Hope. “Together, we are breaking the chains of addiction, building bridges of hope and ensuring that every individual has the opportunity to heal, thrive and contribute to a brighter future for our community.”

Lawrence County, home to approximately 16,000 Kentuckians, is supporting the commonwealth’s thriving economy by helping those in recovery obtain second chance employment opportunities through Millard College’s “Work Ready’ pathways to high-paying trades, including welding. Addiction Recovery Care has also supported the local economy with multiple fair chance employment training opportunities. In addition to employment, the county operates the federally funded Transition Age Youth Launching Realized Dreams initiative, which provides addiction treatment and support services to youth ages 16 to 25. The county’s certified community behavioral health clinic also provides residents with access to 24/7 behavioral health crisis services, enhanced interventions for dual-diagnosis patients and detoxification services.

“The Recovery Ready Certification is a transformative step for the city of Louisa and Lawrence County. It reflects our community’s unwavering commitment to supporting individuals and families affected by substance use disorder,” Louisa Mayor Harold Slone said. “This achievement is not just a recognition – it’s a call to action to continue fostering hope, recovery and opportunity for everyone. Together, we are building a stronger, healthier future.”
